FUNCTIONS OF TRADE UNIONS

At a recent Rudapest conference of the leatherworkers' trade union, Mihaly Csako, spokesman for the union, outlined the part the trade unions should play in improving the quality of consumers' goods and enforcing work discipling.

Csake approved rigorous application of the ruling that work should be paid for according to quality in order to eliminate rejects engendered by careless work. He added that although praising the workers who produced high-quality goods and openly exposing those whose work was unsatisfactory has not yet become daily routine the unions were campaigning for such action.

Grake felt that teaching the workers to execute government regulations and thereby fulfill their production plans was the unions' most important mission.

Earoly Kiss, member of the Political Commission of Hungarian Workers Party, emphasized the need for enforcing work discipline. Work discipline would not improve, he maintained, unless trade union officials cooperated with enterprise cancer of work discipline.

He also pointed out that the prejudice against teaching women to handle machinery must be overcome, and more time should be devoted to the workers'
